Krauss Calls for Vote of No Confidence in God

STEVEN TECEDY
Staff "Reporter"

Professor Lawrence Krauss, former figurehead of the Case Western Reserve University Physics Department, has called for a vote of no confidence in the Lord Almighty. "There needs to be a change in direction," Krauss explained in a statement, "because I believe His lack of communication is inappropriate for a leader." God has come under attack for telling humanity to "have faith" in His actions instead of explaining His planned policies and for not allowing input from His followers in His decisions. Furthermore, God has come under fire in the past two millennia in particular for threatening nonbelievers with scare tactics such as eternal damnation.

The move has already been met by sharp criticism by some theologians. "Sure, God is a little on the secretive side, but He does some great things from those who follow Him," said Eszti Medsource from Very Important University, citing eternal salvation and protection from harm as a few of the incentives. Several others were quick to point out God's command to "go forth and multiply" as another prime leadership move, as it encourages greater numbers in the ranks of the human populace.

Krauss, however, remained unmoved. "Although I am sure God had good intentions in the beginning, His leadership has undeniably faltered in recent years and His choice of assistants has been questionable," he explained from his office. "Also, many of the decisions throughout His time in power have been dubious at best, such as creating the 1980s. And I won't even begin to wonder what He was thinking when He decided English units would be a good idea..." Krauss was then interrupted by several thunderclaps, an earthquake, and a plague of locusts that began to rain down in his office. He could not be reached for further comment.

The vote, which will take place in the next few weeks, will require a majority of the populace to choose "no confidence" in order to pass. It is uncertain how many eligible voters will show up, however, because of questions regarding the legal aspects of the vote. "I'm pretty sure when we agreed to that Covenant thing we wrote ourselves into a corner," explained Ms. Faith B. Leaver, referring to a written document promising exclusive worship of God in exchange for protection. "By promising the Lord that he would be before all others, many people are essentially blackmailed into a position where participation in such a vote would be very conflicted."

Further disapproval was heard from the Misdiscovery Institute, a conservative think-tank that promotes Intelligent Falling (the belief that the Theory of Gravity is flawed and instead things are pushed downward by an intelligent force). "Frankly, I'm wondering about that Star Trek guy's credibility in proposing this," one spokesman told us. "He has shown the Institute time and time again that he cannot come to grips with how gravity is a theory in crisis because physicists cannot explain how it works. And would you trust the motives of a man who is so close-minded and unfair that he does not want students to make informed decisions?"

Despite several pilgrimages to Mount Sinai, the Lord could not be reached for comment. Confidential sources say He is not too worried about the outcome of the vote, however, because of its non-binding nature even if the measure comes to pass. Only the Board of Deities presiding over the multiverse would have the ability to rescind Him of His position.

Observer Cancelled; Obvious Not So Hard to Deal With

CHASE SICKY
Staff "Reporter"

It is with great sadness and heaviness of heart that this journalist reports that after a long, successful career, The Observer will be no more. Case Western Reserve University, a school with a penchant for technology and innovation, has decided that the student newspaper is simply irrelevant now.

The news came shortly after the College of Arts and Sciences released its vote of "no confidence" in President Hundert. According to one source who asked to remain nameless, The Observer "might have been important in breaking the news back during the Pony Express. Now, once a week simply isn't good enough."

Trouble for The Observer began when Case introduced Case Daily, a revolutionary spambot that began to distribute "news" articles relevant to campus life on a daily basis, as the name implies. The reaction to the email was immediate: students were disgusted. The days of ignoring any and all news in order to play World of Warcraft were quickly over. The age of innocence had passed. Students were outraged. "Why do I care about a janitor being added to the chemistry department?" remarked one biomedical engineering major on his way to physics lab.

However, the Board of Trustees wholeheartedly approved of their attempts to connect to the current generation. One such member spoke to me, though he must have been trying to remain anonymous with his baseball cap and sunglasses. "Peeps are LMAOing at Case Daily!" he declared. "It's da $#!+. We're 133t."

Unfortunately, this leaves The Observer pwned. The Trustees voted unanimously to can the newspaper after years of dedication to the whole, sugarcoated news with a fun page that put The Athenian, its only journalistic competition, to absolute shame. The staff received no notification of The Observer's demise. Instead, editors reported to their headquarters one night to find that their keys could not unlock the office door. This had happened many times before as Case's staff is infamous for changing the locks of the wrong door, but this time there was a notice: "Observ-

Imaginary Problems Made Real

The White House, Home of the Whopper®--PI Wire--Secretary of Offense Donald “Trump” Rumsfeld announced today that his department has found how imaginary threats can be made real by multiplying them with other imaginary threats. “Imaginary threats are a lot more difficult to deal with than real ones,” he explained, “but our analysts have discovered that multiplying one imaginary quantity with another imaginary quantity you end up with a real product. Which is how imaginary threats like WMDs and the Hussein-al Qaeda connection have proliferated together to give us the real problems in Iraq we have today!”

When asked about recent civil conflicts and involvement of American troops in such situations, Rumsfeld replied, “First, there is no civil conflict: this is just extremely violent nation-building. Second, should there actually be a civil war American troops would not be involved, unless, of course, they are actually involved.”

At this point in the proceedings all rational thought left the room and committed suicide. The Secretary had no comment.

Saddam Hussein Says He’s ‘Not Afraid to Die’

Gagbhad--PI Wire--At the most recent random outburst at the trial of the former Iraqi dictator, Saddam Hussein said he’s “not afraid to die.”

“All in all, this works out pretty well,” said the main prosecutor, “because we’re not afraid to kill him.”

Poll Shows Half of Americans Evenly Divided

PI Wire News Central--A new Giddyup

Poll released today shows that 50.1% of American households think the country is slightly more than evenly divided, whereas 49.9% think the division is not quite half-way yet. The poll was taken with a margin on one inch on the sides and one and a half inches on the top and bottom.

Lichtenstein Changes Its Name

Some Random Place In Europe--PI Wire--The Duchy of Lichtenstein has announced that, effective immediately, the name has been changed to Frankenstein in order to attract more tourists. The Duchy’s motto will also be changed to reflect this change from its current “Significantly Bigger Than San Marino” to “It’s alive! It’s ALIVE!!!”

Utterly no one has been reported to care save a few peasants brandishing pitchforks.

North Korea Threatens West- Again

Pingpongyinyang--PI Wire--North Korean paranoid psychopath Beloved Leader Kim ‘Ding’ Dong Ill has once again threatened to not “play nice” with the other kids if he doesn’t get his way. The dictator was then sent to his room without any food for dinner and told he wasn’t allowed to play with his shiny toys until he learns to control his temper.

No Confidence Vote Spurs other Significant Vote

JAMES STAFFORD Future Editor-In-Chief

As we all know, President Hundert recently announced his resignation. This came about after the Case Arts and Sciences faculty voted 131-44 for lack of confidence in the president. While Hundert was originally shaken, some less publicized votes swayed his opinion.

“It’s hard to run a university when the homeless vote no confidence against you.” Hundert said at a press release. “I realized it was time to step down.”

The faculty vote was immediately followed by several monumental votes. 60 rats in the Biology department voted no confidence before dying in an experiment. Quick to follow suit, 40 squirrels voted no confidence before ending up as Leutner food. Over 300 homeless people voted no confidence (there were originally 900 voting no confidence until Hundert started throwing money in the air). The Binary Walkway turned the tide for Hundert, casting 0101 votes on his behalf. In the end, the Adelbert Bridge cast the decisive vote of no confidence in the president. It could not be reached for comment.

“I was shocked and saddened.” A distraught Hundert replied. “I thought the pedestrian walkway left us on good terms.

After hearing the bridge’s decision, I knew I had to resign...” Hundert left the interview in tears.

The results of this vote have also spurred other votes.

- Athenian Editor votes no confidence in his writers.
- Anarchists vote no confidence in “the man.”
- EMO people vote no self confidence.
- Case engineers vote no confidence with women.
- Saddam Hussein votes no confidence with the American legal system.

- Darwin and the missing link voted no confidence with creationism.

Case to Replace Textbooks with Wikipedia

In a move to place Case on the forefront of revolutionary educational methods, Case has announced its intention to replace all textbooks with the online encyclopedia source Wikipedia for the entirety of classes starting in the fall 2006 semester. This move comes after a realization that Case does not make additional money off of increased textbook costs and that the savings made by students by not purchasing textbooks could be passed on to additional tuition hikes.

This move was met with enthusiasm from the student body. “Already I use Wikipedia for all of my research and reference needs,” said Amanda Langley, a junior German/Astronomy/Biology/Chemistry major. “Now I will no longer need to pay for overpriced paperweights that never leave their wrapping.”

In addressing concerns that Wikipedia lacks credibility due to its nature as it is able to be edited by anyone, Case responded that this represents a benefit as professors now have the capability to edit the texts they are using to reflect areas they wish to teach. Case also commented that this allows for an unprecedented level of synergy between professors and students in the development of course material.

Gary Zarell, Head Of PETR To Speak At Case

Gary Zarell, head of the organization People for the Ethical Treatment of Robots, is scheduled to speak at Case on Tuesday, April 18 in Strosacker Auditorium. Mr.

Zarell is best known for his controversial statements on robot ownership and is expected to condemn Case for its creation and use of its giant robot army.

Student organization Students for a New World Order has announced a counter protest claiming that robots are unintelligent and therefore lack rights, and that giant robots are necessary for the completion of their club’s manifesto. University programming defended its decision to have Mr. Zarell speak on the grounds that he provides a usually unspoken viewpoint on campus.

Case To Present Hundert With Giant Robots As Part Of Special Severance Package

The Athenian has learned that part of recently-resigned President Hundert’s severance package is in the form of six giant robots from Case’s giant robot army. These giant robots are several of the most recently constructed versions, complete with 10.1 surround sound speakers, mp3 player dock, coffee warmers, and leather seats. This forms an extended benefit element of the severance package due to a condition where if Hundert successfully saw through the construction of the first batch of giant robots then this benefit would automatically trigger if Hundert left the University for any reason. It is estimated that the giant robots in question have a net market value of $8,000,000,000.

President Hundert Resigns Due To Illegal War, Torture

Case Western Reserve University's president announced his resignation this month after a vote of no-confidence from a large majority (as in more than 6 times 8%) of professors, both tenured and non-tenured, from much more than one school in the college.

Dr. Edward Hundert, in an open letter to the university, said that he took full responsibility for record deficits after leading Case into a costly war with the World's Less-Powerful Learning Institutions, which led to a seemingly unending insurgency. He also took responsibility for not having a clear plan of improvement and lasting investment in the school, changes that needed to be made to succeed in the new decade, as well as for not increasing the reputation and enrollment as an undergraduate institution. In particular, he blamed himself for not increasing the amount of enrollment of highly-qualified students, citing his unpopular war and crimes against humanity as "really pissing off the rest of the academic world."

"Honestly, if only a small minority of tenured faculty thought I was unpopular, or if I had succeeded in my goals of making this school a stronger institution by making the necessary changes that would finally unite us as a single entity, I probably wouldn't have resigned. I would have wanted to see these changes through and not damage the reputation of the school by being the second president in four years to resign prematurely," Hundert said.

The no-confidence vote was organized by Prof. Lawrence Krauss, the former Physics Dept. Chair. After losing his son to the war against evolution, he has since become embittered at all institutions and eagerly accepted the offer to be a media 'companion' as other, more respected faculty in the physics department presented actually factual information in their arguments against the President.

"Yeah I realized I'm gonna take flak, and I thought long and hard about it and it was not an easy decision, it was not an easy decision at all. And really the concern as I watched is this institution ... suffered under extreme mismanagement. Now I happened to initiate this but this is not me against the president in any way. It's a terrible decision to make," Krauss actually really said in a real interview. President Hundert agreed with the very last bit, but would have appreciate a spokesperson who could elaborate a bit better on the other parts.

The no-confidence vote also was carried Provost John Anderson. Anderson was under fire as a less-prominent figurehead of the international and internal problems Case is facing, though some would argue that since he and the Board of Trustees control Hundert's tenure, Hundert is actually their puppet. But Anderson has been saved from serious political flak lately after shooting his best friend (Hundert) in the face, literally. Well, also metaphorically, depending on how you're reading this.

"I guess being several billion dollars in debt isn't the big issue," anti-Hundert students said. "That'll happen at any institution where research dollars don't quite meet projections, and economically a national institution has no incentive to save anyway. The thing that would make it not just a desire, but an obligation to resign is jeopardizing our physical security with irresponsible dealings and an endless war, and destroying our international reputation and making people not want to come here. He's done that. Or maybe not, depending on who you're talking about."

Faith In The Classroom: Will The Fittest Values Survive?

DRAQUE
Illustrations Editor

Case Western Reserve is an institution that has sought for many years to give the most rigorous mathematical education possible for the students who need it. All of those majors that need a solid grounding in higher math beam with pride as they think of the ease with which they can perform all manner of complex calculations. Not a day goes by when a Computer Science graduate doesn't perform differential equations.

It's come to light recently that the school is rooted in tradition, unable to keep up with the times. Like most public schools in the country (save those forward thinking bastions of intellectual integrity in Kansas), the faculty are fighting this new wave of mathematics. I speak of course of Faith-Based Mathematics.

This new breakthrough in the field of mathematics has shown enormous popularity with typically unscientific and secular students. Local scientific authorities such as Father Kershaw expressed great surprise at how readily these Darwin-worshipping scientific throwbacks have taken to what must be a frightening new concept for them.

"Faith-Based Math? Like I don't have to give proofs any more? Dude, I would worship anyone for that!" said newly converted young student. This reaction is hardly a fluke among students. Nearly every student polled who was taking math-based courses seemed in favor of this new concept.

Within the next month, a vote conducted by the National Society of Scientific Christ-Based Thought is to be taken to decide whether traditional or Faith-Based Math should be correct. If an authority as great as theirs backs it, it will only be a matter of time before curricula across God's great nation start picking it up. With the support shown from the Case student body, it seems to be a happy inevitability.

Case Center for Women Changes Focus/Improves Facilities

LENIN IN SQUAD
Staff "Reporter"

After a new internal study, the Case Center for Women is undergoing some dramatic changes. Top on the list is a complete remodeling of the facility. The waiting room, brochures, and counseling facilities are all being replaced by model kitchens, sewing machine stations, and a new early testing center for pregnancy. According to sources inside, these changes should give women more useful knowledge for their future lives. New studies show that empowerment and classical education for women only serve to breed unhappiness in marriage, increase the divorce rate, increase cases of cancer, lung disease, gout, and leukemia, increase the number of retarded children born, and cause the extinction of several small mammals. These sweeping changes are being capped by the appointment of a new director for the center, ex-university President Hundert. When asked for comment, he said, "My goal is to get women back where they belong, and produce the world's most powerful breeding environment."

Letters to the Editor

(Reprinted from The Observer)Athenian abuses first amendment freedoms*To the Editor:

Chances are, you've seen The Athenian around campus. If not, The Athenian is a monthly magazine published by Case students that tends to deviate from the beaten journalistic path. There's nothing wrong with such an idea; in fact, I believe one should be applauded for taking the road less traveled.

However, after reading the February issue, I realized that The Athenian is nothing more than using the first amendment simply because someone can, a wholly irresponsible act. The issue opens with an article entitled "OMG I hate nerds," in which the writer attacks students for being diligent in their studies and for not drinking. The rest of the issue stumbles through a random spat of articles and discourses, while the back cover shows a man beating a horse (although obviously fake), with the message: "Many animals were harmed during the writing of the Athenian. Screw you PETA." Such gestures are entirely inappropriate and unnecessary. Offending someone for the sake of showing that you can is not making a statement, it's being irresponsible with your right to free speech.

I can't stand the people who carry the first amendment in a holster on their side, ready to pull it out at will as justification for their inappropriate remarks and characterizations. People should be offended when other people characterize others based on their sexual preference, ethnicity or in some other inappropriate manner. Whether they know it or not, such statements hurt others, yet there's no reason for them. When you can express yourself in so many ways, why do you have to do it this way? To me, it shows a lack of grasp of the English language and general disregard for the feelings of others.

It's time people took responsibility for what comes out of their mouths. The first amendment should be viewed as the right to say something, not as the fortress to hide behind after you say it.

Alexander Cooke
Undergraduate Student

Dear Mr. Cooke,

First, I'd like to thank you for pointing out an error that has been overlooked in many issues of The Athenian. Whenever we talk about letters to the editor, we say something along the lines of "The Athenian encourages letters to the editor." The problem is that we didn't explain to which editor you should write letters (obviously we mean this editor--me). This error will no longer show up in subsequent issues.

On to your point. We have never used the First Amendment to justify ourselves because nobody (both contributors and readers) takes The Athenian seriously enough to require justification of anything printed therein. In my four years with this organization, I cannot remember a single time we have put the word "Amendment" directly after the word "First" in any context, nor has anyone ever asked us to do so. I could be wrong (this happens regularly).

It is true that what we write is "inappropriate and unnecessary" (emphasis on "unnecessary.") However, we're not in the business of taking responsibility for what comes out of our mouths, since The Athenian doesn't come out of anyone's mouth. We try to bring satire to the masses (the "OMG I Hate Nerds" article is a ripoff of an Observer article, by the way), and since most people at Case find The Athenian funny, we're going to continue doing the things that we've always done.

Instead of "Athenian abuses first amendment freedoms," your letter should be titled "I found certain parts of The Athenian unfunny." Your argument might be a good weapon for defeating those who actually misuse the First Amendment, but it is useless for destroying fortresses that do not exist.

Hugs and kisses,
The editor

P.S. Everyone on our staff thought your letter was hilarious. Would you like to contribute to us? Our e-mail address is athenian@case.edu.

— EDITORIAL —

A Farewell from the Editor

Dear Members of the Case Western Reserve University Community,

Last night I informed our Board of Trustees that I will step down as President and Editor-in-Chief of The Athenian effective April 1, 2006. They responded by saying "Who the hell are you and what the hell is The Athenian?" They then lambasted me with a volley of profanity and death threats.

How times change. I reminisce about myself as a little baby freshman (I've been at Case since 1985) who started his Athenian career with—of all things—an article about how The Observer sucks. And now I finish by releasing an April Fools' issue which emulates the very same publication. I feel proud and dirty all at the same time.

I hand the reins back to the liberal artists, where things like "literary publications" and "knowing grammar" belong. Englishman (Englishperson?) James Stafford has been an invaluable contributor and member of our staff, and I'm excited to know that he'll bring actual ideas and competence to the Editorship. Furthermore, our Business Manager duties has been passed from Engineer Zach Stevens to Political Scientist/Businesswoman (Businessperson?) Asta Gerbec. It's also worth noting that Asta will be our first female Business Manager, our first freshman Business Manager (she takes over after this issue), and the first female freshman to hold any sort of office. Also, Stafford is black. Huzzah for diversity!

Before I go, I've got a story to tell. In November 2005, President Hundert conducted the first of his fireside chats in the common room of one of the new dorms. Seeing an opportunity, I waited until the end of the talk and asked Dr. Hundert if he wanted to be The Athenian's next faculty advisor.

"I'd love to, but I... can't. I'd really love to," said the stymied president before nervously walking away.

I just stood there, disappointed. The next day, I was talking to Dr. Lawrence Krauss about the ordeal.

"I asked Hundert if he wanted to be our next advisor, and he just walked away! What a jerk!" I exclaimed.

"What a jerk... what a jerk, indeed," Dr. Krauss muttered quietly to himself. He then walked away as if immersed in thought.

And the rest is history.

I'd like to thank (most of all) The Athenian staff for putting up with my shenanigans. It's been a fun four-year run, and I will always remember the times we've had. Finally, to anyone who has impacted me in any way during the last four years, I'll rip off Sam and Max: Freelance Police: I don't know how to thank you, so I don't think I will. Good night, everyone.

Signed,

Scott J. Milinovich, (future) M.D.

Lack Of “Intelligence” In Case Class “Design”

THE RIGHT MINDSET • Lenin in Squad

Its about time the President got off his flaming liberal evolution cushion and actually acted like a true conservative. The existence of stem cell research and baby genocide by “doctors” is disgusting enough, but the great courts of this land have still failed to recognize His glorious creation was created by Him and by Him alone. The fact that schools such as this one still teach courses about that hideous fool Darwin and his “evolution” is an abomination to good conservatives.

I hardly need to point out the many critical flaws in the misguided theory of “evolution,” however, I’m going to point them out anyway. Firstly, “evolution” fails to recognize that only God can create life. Every child born has been personally touched by His loving hand, and that alone is all that is needed to create life. Everything else you have heard is utter folly, especially that “sexual education” rubbish they are teaching our children nowadays. Sex cannot produce a baby; only God can. To even hint that a species could have been created by anything other than His Holiness is direct blasphemy. Obviously life is much too complicated for anyone to understand, and courses about “evolution” only serve to breed more of those contemptuous engineers who think they know everything.

Secondly, “evolution” is rumored to take many millions of years. Any sane, rational person knows the earth is only about six thousand years old, so even if it did exist, “evolution” could never have had happened. These misguided fools calling themselves scientists only produce obscure and contradictory “facts” used to muddle the minds of the devout and serve no purpose but to turn people away from God. Such concocted evidence such as “dinosaur” bones are completely fictional. It’s easy to see that all dinosaur bones are produced in secret government laboratories and are hidden in the ground to confused good people. They are nothing more than a cleverly hidden ploy by secular governments to pollute the minds of otherwise good people.

Even with so much evidence showing that evolution is nothing more than a delusional theory entirely designed to blaspheme God and put a disgusting heretic in the history books, this university still insists on teaching courses about it. I demand the university cancel any courses hinting at evolution forthwith. This should also include biology, anthropology, pathology, computer science, and any history course not entirely based on the bible. Only through a united effort can we hope to drive back the scourge of science and actually begin teaching real knowledge, and this university should lead the crusade.

“You Can’t Have ‘Conservative’ without CASE”

A LITTLE TO THE LEFT • Chase Sicky, Insane Liberal

When I was in high school, my government teacher told the class with a sneer that college settings are more liberal than anywhere else. I fantasized about the day I would get to my dorm room and stickytack my poster of Bill Clinton to the ceiling (which, with my lofted bed, would bring me all the closer to Slick Willy). Instead, here I am at college, and what do I see? A zoo with elephants on proud display.

I am disgusted by the condoms in the vending machines in residential halls. The consumerist/capitalist culture is pushing its noses into our bedrooms even before some of us can vote. The RAs can distribute condoms freely and plentifully when one wishes to copulate. To me, this is just another one of Bush’s attacks upon premarital sex and, accordingly, anything against the Christian Right. This is why I propose that we build an abortion clinic on campus.

With the additions of the Binary Walkway and the Village at 115, Case has clearly proven that it wishes to promote construction at all times. An abortion clinic would be just as useful as these two establishments. After all, we need to kill our children so the conservatives do not enlist them to the war in Iraq (since we all know it will truly go on that long). Also, I have a sneaking feeling that Bush eats babies for breakfast, and if not, your children could be playing in the woods when a drugged up Dick Cheney decides it’s time to hunt. We cannot let this happen to our great nation.

The time for action is this fall. A new president will grace our campus. In all likelihood, this president will be like most presidents—white and male. The time to act is now. Start sending your letters to the Case administration to make certain that the next president is both black and female. As a woman, the new president will know what it’s like to have the ability to create life. Beyond that, a silly thing like a budget is trivial (but, for the record, a woman would be much more sensible at shopping from extensive experience). By being black, she will know what it is like to encounter adversity. I could deal with a Latina president, but let’s not go with Asian. That would just being playing into the “all Asians are smart” stereotype, and that’s just racist.

In time, and with a lot of dedication, perhaps we can aspire to be like the greatest ideological hub in the United States—Oberlin College.

We like to be conservative in leaving white space. Har Har

SAGES Blows; University Raises Tuition

ASTA GERBEC
Staff “Reporter”

The first year of the full SAGES program has gone down. I, as a prime candidate for a lobotomy and a current SAGES student, decided to get the campus pulse concerning the program. Taking this figure of speech literally, I hold my hand to the ground outside Crawford (home of the SAGES café no less) to feel a pulse. Nothing. I take this as a bad sign and continue my investigation.

Next I use my SAGES acquired skills to do some research. Since I don’t do books, I use the computer. While watching that weird commercial with the pork chop making out with a peach, I hit up the first logical place that an overly involved freshman would for information on the Case student body: Facebook. Filled with anticipation I search the groups for “sages” (all lowercase, it’s too difficult to capitalize since I got in that bear fight and lost a pinkie). As I scan the results, I see that 2 out of 3 groups dedicated to the undergraduate program are negative. Strike two Mr. Case SAGES Creator.

I then use the most professor distrusted, student only-source-used-but-not-recognized-on-bibliography research paper source, and random fact checker on the web: Wikipedia. Typing in “sages,” I get several responses including an X-Men character, an underground Rhode Island rapper, and an herb. Three relevant responses stand out. A sage can actually be a wise man or mystic. This makes sense to me because the number of Case students playing World of Warcraft at this very moment outnumbers the amount of students who have gotten any in the past year. SAGE is also a professional group for those who maintain IT systems. Think Jimmy Fallon’s SNL sketch “Your Company’s Computer Tech Guy”. It also stands for a strain of cannabis...this association is self-explanatory.

As a final step in my research I interview some people in the Case community as to their feelings on SAGES. As soon as I bring up SAGES to my first interviewee his face turns red and he screams, “SAGES is bullshit! It ruined my freshman year! It caused me to kill a man!” I slowly backed away as the student’s mouth began to foam. A bit skittish now that murder has been associated with the program, I approach another student. She responds, “SAGES... that’s interesting, I don’t seem to remember that on my schedule.” Out of surprise, my pen slipped and I stabbed myself in the eye. As I mopped the blood, I reminded the student that all freshmen were required to submit themselves to the beast. “Oh ya, I went a couple times and it sucked. So I filed a sexual assault claim with the police against the university, specifically the SAGES program, for forcing me to take it up the butt. I was actually asked to leave the SAGES program! And the university.”

Last, I interview a SAGES professor who asked not to be named. I meet them in a back alley, ala Deep Throat. A little shaky, he takes a drag on a cigarette. “Its not working out so well. I decided to teach this course to reconnect with the student body. So much for that. My students are either apathetic, hate me, or fall asleep in class. Some of them snore, but I don’t have the heart to wake them up. The university’s sunk so much money into this program; if they heard I was talking to you I’d be stamped out!” A car backfires, and he scampers away before I have a chance to ask any more questions. I see a comb-over flash in the wind...President H?

All in all, the SAGES program is an unfortunate failure. Instead of being the innovative program it was touted to be, students associate it instead with obscenities and being a pain in the ass. But there is a positive in all this. Acronym usage is at an all time high!

HANK LILAC-CAN
Staff "Reporter"

Ohio City

One of the great shining examples of Cleveland's "economic resurgence", Ohio City consists of a collection of shops, restaurants, and apartments along West 25th Street near the Lorain intersection, then a whole lot of neighborhood the well-wishers tend to ignore.

Standing proudly over the W. 25-Lorain intersection is the West Side Market, a collection of small food stalls enclosed in an old train station. You can find just about anything there, from obscure cheeses to expertly cut meat to fresh, organic vegetables to foreign cuisine to skinned, bisected goat heads. Attached to this is a collection of fine Arabic and Greek restaurants, which aren't exactly classy but tend to be reliably decent.

The other shops in the are offer nothing of value. Bastions of crappy furniture, kitschy crap, and moped outlets, most of the stores in Ohio City exist because businessmen from the sub-burbs took a look at the dropping property values and virtually crapped their pants. Not only do they offer things only other suburbanites want or can pay for, but they do so under the claim that they're helping to revitalize a failing area.

Just ignore all the homeless that wander up and down the strip. At best, they've got a few bus passes to sell you. At worst, they just need two bucks for "the bus." Once shooting other human beings become legal again, I can guarantee you that the local merchants association will have this infestation cleared right up.

Just try to avoid walking half a mile in any direction or you might witness just how healthy the Ohio City economy is.

Tremont

Kind of like Ohio City's asshole cousin. Only with more churches.

To be fair, Tremont is actually an area with some rich community attractions. The public park there is well maintained and features a swimming pool that's popular in the summer months. Local bars that have stood since time in memorial are still decent places to hang out and maybe get a good meal, even if the Lincoln Park Pub ruined its image by daring to get repainted. Houses of worship come a dime a dozen (competing with nearby Church Square for religious redundancy), including a variety of Protestant denominations, Catholic churches for about six different ethnic groups, and a Russian Orthodox church a hop-skip-and-a-hallelujah away. There's even a local Shakespearean troupe that occasionally performs in the park in the Summer and in one of the churches during the winter (I saw them do a fine Macbeth, although budget constraints restricted costumes down to black turtlenecks for everyone).

However, Tremont is also flushed with high-class restaurants. Very high class. As in, why the hell am I even telling college students they exist? How swank are these places? So swank they have valets, that park your car four blocks over in the projects and expect a twenty-dollar tip for doing so. Seriously, it's like watching a dog piss on your leg and then beg for a treat. How good is the food there? Well, they use a really obscure kind of bread, so that chicken sandwich you had is obviously worth the twelve-dollar price tag. The cheapest food I ever got at Tremont came from a Church function where aging hippies got together and discussed how to make Cleveland more socialist.

Did I mention all the Churches? Boy, I'd hate to miss that.

I can give you two reasons to visit Tremont. One, somewhere in that waspy mess is buried a kick-ass little ice cream shop. Two, on nearby Denison road is an intersection with three gas stations. It's competition in your favor.

Four Random Films, Reviewed with Care

Last weekend on January 12th, as part of a tribute to the work of filmmaker Ken Jacobs, the Cleveland Museum of Art showed a series of films made by, about, and inspired from the influential artist. All made in the last year, these films showcase the best of 2002's video art scene, and demonstrate keenly what modern art in a nonclassical medium is all about.

The Shaggy Bad Actor (2006)
Rated PG (98 min.) Director: Brian Robbins
With Tim Allen, Kristin Davis, Zena Grey

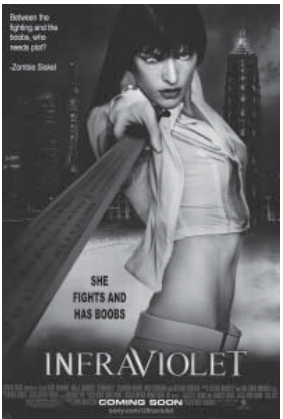

The Shaggy Bad Actor actually was probably the best movie ever made. It is not very realistic, though. When Tim Allen's character is chasing the cat and rams the old lady for example, she goes flying and hits a tree. She probably should have exploded. I like my dog transformation movies to be more realistic than that. My favorite quote was "Wow, you sure are a great actor, Tim Allen!" On a scale of good to bad, I would probably give this movie 12 gold stars and a burrito. Seeing it is life changing. We all need a shaggy bad actor.

InfraViolet (2006)

Rated PG-13 (88 min.) Director: Kurt Wimmer
Milla Jovovich, Cameron Bright, Nick Chinlund

InfraViolet is easily the best movie that I have ever seen. Probably better than all other movies combined. Violet is this girl with boobs. The director, Kurt Wimmer, also directed Equilibrium, but it didn't have much in the way of boobs, so it wasn't as good. There was fighting in this movie too, which made it even better. There was this one part where this big thing exploded, and I got pretty excited at this point. I'm not sure why it exploded, but they Violet started jumping around with her boobs, so I'm pretty sure it was just a metaphor for boobs. The best quote in the movie was this one time when you almost got to see Violet's nipple. I give it a hundred platinum check marks for quality.

1. Flo Rounds the Corner - Ken Jacobs

Jacobs's subject, Flo, walks down the street and around the corner. It delivers what it promises. However, there is more to it than that.

I will take the risk of demeaning Jacobs's work by calling it a study, because essentially that is what it is. It's a study for his own medium, and a study for the audience. It opens up an entirely new perspective on the possibilities of not only film, but any attempt at medial representation one can think of.

Shot using a stereoscopic camera, the action is run segmentally, pausing for several moments to replay several frames over repeatedly, or mismatch different angles in the stereoscopic film. What results is an interesting perspective on the illusion of motion and of depth, and perhaps even the reliance in modern film of using the former to suggest the latter. Jacobs vividly demonstrates how far our minds go to generate this illusion, and even seems to laugh at the willingness of modern film audiences to let themselves become completely engrossed in so blatant a misrepresentation of reality.

2. Nervous Ken - Henry Hill

Hill is filming an interview in black and white of Ken Jacobs at his studio by a pre-teen girl. Though the girl asks Jacobs very interesting questions, the interview is not the point of the film. Hill uses this opportunity to both poke fun at and probe the nature of what he and Jacobs do in their art, and he always keeps a sense of humor about it.

The subject is how motion shapes form in a two-dimensional medium, but the film also seemed to try to hit on human language and the parallels of the vocal and visual attempts of humans to communicate their reality to others. Using a technique similar to that of Flo Rounds the Corner, Hill selects random bits of visual footage and runs through them, repeating frames in a slow progression showing bit by bit how the motion is being conveyed. The associated audio tracks are played alongside each frame, and the effect is that the conveyence of the sound is slowly revealed to the audience, but in a way so broken that it loses all meaning that that sound would otherwise carry in a normal progression. This breaking-down of the action often occurs at very

datesandfucking On Cheating

MARS,
Roman God of
NAILING BITCHES

In almost every relationship, it's an issue somehow. Whether it's something that's happened, or something that one (or both) people in a relationship are simply paranoid about, it can be the cause of a breakup. It's ended countless relationships through history. I'm talking, of course, about cheating.

The problem with cheating is that once your SO finds out, it's going to be all kinds of trouble. That's why it's very important that when you break the bond of trust between the two of you, you need to cover your tracks, so that your filthy, dirty secret can never be found. Remember: it's only wrong if you get caught defiling the sacred union formed between two people who care for each other.

The first step is to remember the opposing gender name for anyone who you betray your SO's trust with. You can put these names into your cell phone, and they will not look suspicious. For example, Judy can be James, Andrew becomes Audrey, and Rodney converts to Rhodna. If you ever forget your phone at the ol' ball and chain's place, you can breathe easy knowing that the worst that can happen is your sexuality being questioned.

The first step is to be ready at any moment to emotionally crush the person with whom you choose to violate the sanctity of your current relationship. Nice people don't cheat in the first place, so if it looks like your side-lay might start blabbing, you shouldn't have much trouble pumping yourself up for a good, solid character assassination.

The third and final step is to remember our old friend Blunt Head Trauma. On the off chance that that pesky better half of yours does find out you've been fooling around, a few well-placed bludgeons can oftentimes clean the memory of the past few hours to a sparkling fresh finish. If it doesn't work the first time, try a few more. If nothing else, they'll get less and less prone to figure out you're up to anything. Now get out there and break some hearts, tiger!

So you have no inspiration

So its one hour until deadline and you have no idea on what to write. Sure, your article may be filler, but you pride yourself on your work. All five of your readers out there eagerly await your advice on the ever elusive obvious. When the Muse will not speak to you, here are some helpful suggestions for forcing inspiration:

- Force somebody else to write for you: When all else fails, use coercion. It saves you the trouble of wracking your brain. Popular techniques include blackmail, subtle manipulation, or just threatening with a blunt object. That kid down the hall never does anything productive, so why not force him off WOW and make him write for you? Just be sure your new writer has no means of escape.
- Drink until you get ideas: Quite frankly, some of my best ideas come across with some help from Jack Daniels. Seriously, everything looks amazing when you are under the influence. Even better, your drinking buddies think it's some of the best stuff they have ever read. If you want to take it one step further, add controlled substances to the mix. Just don't read it when you are sober.
- Tell people something they should already know: It never hurts to make your audience feel intelligent. At the same time, it allows you to meet your deadline with ease. After all, it's easy to write a column on personal hygiene. If you're lucky, maybe those engineering majors in your class will read it and get the hint.

With these suggestions, your writers block should easily crumble. If not, you're screwed.

... RANDOM film reviews

appropriate (or appropriately edited) times in the momentum of the conversation, giving the film an overall strong comedic effect. In its finale, the film cuts into color and the motion is back to realtime (or faster). The only problem is that the individual frames are now being broken down into partially-pixelated collages of previous frames of the movie, reminiscent of the work of Chuck Close, for a stunning animated effect that encapsulates the theme of how parts can represent the whole. The net message: all communication and all visual representation carries no meaning in itself. Meaning can only be characterized by real experience, whatever that may be.

3. Tanka - David Lebrun
This piece is a ballet. Set to southern Asian music, it consists entirely of various brightly-colored pictures of Tibetan Buddhist artwork. Following the tones, beats and rhythms of the music closely, the film works its way from whirling oceans to sprouting flowers to an incredible dance of human figures. Motion is again a theme, but this time the attempt is to create harmonic, natural motion in a way that has rarely been seen before. Though the frame rate is slow enough that the individual pieces can be discerned, the film does an incredible job of letting the audience melt into the action. Though it makes some implications on the chaotic beauty of nature and humanity, the film's goal is to quite simply to be aesthetic, visually and sonically pleasing in the purest sense. Tibetan art is chosen for its color, not the associated politics. The music is selected for its tone and rhythm and little else. Geometric pattern is emphasized in all motion, both the natural and the human. What results is an amazing dance of sound and color to which few can object.

4. One - Fred Worden
As Picasso once said (well, not really), "Good art is copied, great art gives seizures." Using a single black-and-white still image, Worden spliced together bits and pieces and rotations and different lightings and contrasts to create this TIME film, which essentially looked like an animated Rorschach Test with plenty of flashings from frame to frame. There is no discernible "image" to the image, though on some occasions it looked like a face or a skull, which struck me pretty hard. However, this is not the point at all. Like inkblots or many pieces of abstract-expressionist art, the meaning is supposed to come from the viewer alone, with the artist being merely a guide. One illustrated this point very well. Without a sound track, color, or logical suggestion of form, the only thing the audience member can do (aside from walking out) is just stare and become entranced. There is enough logic to the the progression of frames in the way they are panned and rotated that it doesn't take long before the little black spots take up minds of their own. My favorite personal experiences with this piece were those of people first running, then screaming, then dancing, each action and emotion hitting me with an unreal vividness. The film is so long and so monotonous in general that it acts almost identically to sensory deprivation, and if one allows oneself to be hypnotized by the piece, daydreams and waking hallucinations occur freely. There is no excitement in the piece, but there is energy, and that is what is so mesmerizing. A fitting end to the film series, it completes the deconstruction of representation and shows us how we can create any reality we want just by pulling ourselves out of that which we are in.

Comics Turn You Gay?

DRAQUE
Illustrations Editor

For quite some time now, concerned parents have known instinctively that comic books (co-bos, as they are known on the street) are the source of all manner of undesirable activities. From violence to voting for Democrats, these filth-laden abuses of free speech do little more than poison the minds of any who finger through the often sticky pages. The most recent discovery of our researchers has shown that comic books cause one more virulent mental plague, though. That plague is HOMOSEXUALITY. Though one would at first think that even the producers of comic books have some level of decency, this seems not to be the case. After countless hours of scouring venom-dripping leaflets of disease, our tireless researchers have come the conclusion that the inevitable result of this form of self abuse (that is to say, reading the defiled papers), is incurable homosexuality. Immediately after the research was completed, the researchers were executed for homosexuality, and while we thank them for their sacrifice, they are likely burning in a pool of liquid lead at the moment. Below are some of the tamer examples of the faggotry inducing picto-sins. If you feel that you are weak of spirit, please skip over them, as they might very well induce an unquenchable thirst for cock. You have been warned.

Ultimate Frisbee: Not A Sport, Stupid As Hell

PHILLIP SEITZER
Sports "Reporter"

Despite a wide fan base and a tradition that spans nearly 4 decades, the sport known as Ultimate Frisbee, or simply Ultimate, is not actually a sport, but is, in fact, a bunch of retards throwing a Frisbee around. While many would argue that Ultimate Frisbee is as (if not more) legitimate than sports such as soccer or basketball, no, actually, they are wrong.

Ultimate Frisbee is played by two teams of seven people each on a field of 64 meters by 37 meters. Teammates throw a Frisbee back and forth to each other, being careful not to run while possessing the Frisbee. The objective is to receive a teammate's pass while standing in the opposing team's end zone, thus scoring points. The first team to achieve a predetermined number of points is declared the winner.

When queried, Longtime Ultimate enthusiast Paul Morphy described ultimate Frisbee as "the best sport of all" and "a great workout, dude, not to mention, ultimate." Morphy than adjusted his tie-die headband and described a "monster catch" that was "totally killer" in the Ultimate Frisbee team's recent victory. Not everyone had positive things to say regarding the Case Ultimate team, however. One Nelson "Math Master" Fitzgerald, a member of the Nerds-Who-Hit-Other-Nerds-With-Foam-

Shit-Outside-Of-Leutner-Every-Sunday-Afternoon Team, described the Ultimate team as "a bunch of arrogant jerks" who "suck at everything." Nelson also spoke about the legitimacy of foam sword warfare, and how this growing sport would likely overtake Ultimate Frisbee in terms of popularity in the future.

Despite criticism, Ultimate players have confidence in their sport and plan for a bright future. Ultimate player Ron Sawyer reports, "People who don't like Ultimate are like, retarded or something." He also added that to avoid confusion, the name of the sport should be changed to "Ultimate Amazing Magnificent Wonderful Incredible Superior Frisbee."

Highland Games Come to Case

CHRISTOPHER WILLIAMS
Layout Editor

In a move calculated to solidify the bonds among all men who wear skirts, the Case Spartans – fierce skirt-girded warriors, according to the history books – are joining with the kilt-clothed Scots to add the traditional Highland Games events to our spring track roster.

The most important new event will also be one of the most iconic – the caber toss. Similar to javelin in some respects but differing in scale, the caber toss involves picking up and throwing a telephone pole as far as you can. The event is not, however, scored on distance so much as on accuracy. This is probably good, since I'd want anybody throwing trees near me to be more accurate than strong anyway.

It is rumored that the introduction of events such as this one is part of the ongoing campaign to lessen the "geeky" image of Case students. Heavy focus on upper-body-strength-intensive sports like those of the Highland Games may succeed in this by building a generation of buffed-out computer programmers and physicists. Or it may not. When questioned about the rumors, one student, Mortimer MacDaftman replied, "Aye donnae know where ye be gettin' such ideas, laddie, but Aye can tell ye that it be nae' but a load of blarney!" (Our field reporter was summarily executed for reporting that quote. We don't know what's up with it either. Guy must have been Scotch-Irish or something.)

Anyway, now that I'm done proving that you can be racially insensitive to white people, too, I should probably get back to actual reporting. Other events will include Stone Put – which is like that new-fangled shot put, but with rocks, and heavier – and Sheaf Toss – which consists of seeing how high you can throw 16 pounds of straw. Hammer Throw, Weight Toss, and Weight-over-the-Bar are also under consideration. These events involve throwing increasingly larger and larger weights – up to 56 pounds or so – for presumably decreasing distances. These events exist solely for those lucky few who did not herniate themselves during the Stone Put.

What effect these new events will have, both on the competition and on the campus community, remains uncertain. So far, the only noticeable disturbance has been from SCUM, or Student Curling is Underfunded Majorly. This radical activist group is insisting that a curling team be added to the school, despite the fact that curling is not traditionally part of the Highland Games. For developments, keep your newsprint-stained hands tuned to this paper.

You see, even an imaginary universe is real in the context of the medium within which it is represented. Should the artist or author lose inspiration or lack the spark of creation, it is inevitable that this reality (artificial though it may be) will degenerate. That lifeblood of existence which is the will of its creator must be present even in what is accepted in the "true" reality, which is seen as religion.
